0.1 Preserving Grief: From Spontaneous Tributes to Permanent Memorials

ID: WMA2020.SP026

Assigned to: Angela Neller

Track: Collections

This session will show how three institutions dealt with the challenges created by one event, the mass shooting in Las Vegas in October 2017. Panelists will discuss making the initial decision to collect items documenting the event, processing and exhibiting difficult and emotional collections, and working with the community to create a permanent memorial. Panelists will also show how their responsibilities have changed with the changing needs of the community in the ensuing years.

Session Information

Format: Regular session/panel (roundtable, single speaker, etc.)

Uniqueness: Having dealt with the increasingly relevant issue of documenting the aftermath of tragedy, now three years on, the panelists have unique perspectives to share.

Objectives: This session will show how staff at Las Vegas institutions made decisions to collect items documenting a local mass shooting in October, 2017, and how those decisions affected the way the tragedy is interpreted and remembered. It is aimed at collections management staff, curatorial staff, and management at museums and cultural institutions. Attendees will hear about many issues, both practical and philosophical, that can arise when collecting and interpreting current, tragic, events. These issues include: what should be collected from the actual event, from memorials, and from the community; when should this collecting take place, and when should it end; how should the items be used once they are part of an institution's collection; what issues will institutions face in dealing with government officials, the media, and the community; what financial burdens will institutions face and how can additional funding be found; how will institutions be involved with permanent memorialization of an event. Attendees will also learn how institutions' roles change, both in the immediate aftermath of a tragedy, and as time passes. Attendees will receive tips and strategies for how to deal with collecting after mass tragedies so that they can help their institutions prepare for a similar event. They will also learn about resources available from other institutions who have faced collecting after tragedies, particularly mass shootings. Presenters will provide written procedures created specifically for rapid response collecting as well as examples of press releases and other public outreach.

Engagement: Each panelist will present their experiences, and invite the audience to join in a discussion about what was presented. If necessary, participation will be encouraged by asking audience members about their own experiences or their institutions' plans to address issues covered in the presentations. Since the panelists will have presentations, a projector and screen, or similar, will be needed.

Relationship to Theme: When collecting and interpreting tragic current events, institutions must learn to use their collections and expertise in new and unexpected ways. By preparing for changing opportunities and responsibilities, institutions can not only move themselves forward, but help the community move forward as well.

Audience

Audiences: Curators/Scientists/Historians Registrars, Collections Managers

Professional Level: Emerging Professional Mid-Career Senior Level

Scalability: Institutions of all sizes and types have been asked to collect and interpret spontaneous memorials. The information in this session will pertain to museums large and small, as well as libraries, archives, community centers, and local and regional government organizations.

Cynthia organized and oversaw the intake, cataloging, and storage of thousands of items left at spontaneous memorials created after the mass shooting in Las Vegas. She also acted as the museum's liaison with those affected by the shooting, the media, and the general public. (confirmed)

0.2 Annual Exhibit Critique: Oregon Historical Society's Experience Oregon

ID: WMA2020.SP029

Assigned to: Kathleen Daly

Track:

Join colleagues exploring current best practices in creating exhibitions—this year, with the Oregon Historical Society museum's new permanent exhibit, Experience Oregon. This overarching history exhibit, incorporates opportunities to share ideas/opinions on relevant themes, interactive places throughout, and "Across Time" stations that use broad themes to draw connections between yesterday and today; emphasizing why learning about history matters. The museum is an evening event location, and is free to visit during the conference; please try to see the exhibit prior to the session.

Session Information

Format: Regular session/panel (roundtable, single speaker, etc.)

Uniqueness: This session provides a forum for multiple perspectives from a variety of museum professionals to be expressed, and facilitates increasing our field's creative tools.

Objectives: The session aims, through constructive critique and dialogue, to inform audience members about ways of meeting challenges encountered while creating, installing, and presenting exhibits – issues for exhibit practice that the exhibit raises. Attendees at this session will engage with curatorial practice and visitor engagement through discussions revolving around best practices in exhibit work. In addition to critiquing the single exhibit, the staff at OHM is also interested in hearing impressions from the critique panel and the audience about the new exhibit and experiences at OHM, to incorporate as they design their next experiences. Takeaways will be the notes (mental or written) that audience members make as they listen and participate. Spontaneity is a hallmark of the session, so the specific takeaways cannot be predicted in advance. Past sessions have generated new ideas and approaches especially for operationally bringing exhibits from idea to reality. Tangible takeaways include 1) handouts outlining OHM's exhibit development process, 2) handouts with information and links to current resources on exhibit design, and 3) information on best practices in community engagement through exhibit design. Finally, as the session organizer, two of my goals in taking over the session planning in 2018 has been to expand the pool of Critiquers, and to bring in new voices to the panel.

Engagement: Short intro to the panelists/ session; Short visual introduction to the exhibit (so anyone one who didn't see the exhibit can get an idea of the layout); A critiquer presents overall thoughts, impressions, critique, and questions; Two critiquers pair up - one reviewer/one exhibit team member – for conversations/fire side chats, calling out interesting and/or challenging aspects of the exhibit from different professional lenses and the experience going through the exhibit; Leaves about 30 minutes for audience questions/ audience-driven conversation.

Relationship to Theme: Few things in museums move us FORWARD more than professionals in the field sharing ideas, in this case about exhibits. The ability for audience members to hone their exhibit critiquing skills, while learning from experiences of other professionals in the field, as we examine current exhibition practice, should leave all attending thinking about how they might apply what they learn to move their exhibits and institutions FORWARD.

Additional Comments: Session Abstract: Creating an exhibit, in any discipline, is not a task for the faint of heart. It takes considerable vision, collaboration, planning, and effort to craft an exhibit with a clear purpose, inclusive narrative, and broad engagement. Each year, the WMA annual exhibit critique session shares out observations and assessments of a current exhibit. These have come from a wide variety of museum types, and have covered a range of topics, with the overarching goals being to help the field recognize excellence, create critical dialogue, and to engage museum professionals at WMA in a reflexive process of analysis of exhibit practice in the 21st century. The session focuses on critique that is analytical rather than descriptive. We review large exhibitions seen by thousands of people, small innovative exhibits, and exhibits focused on underrepresented topics. The “critiquers” feature regional museum professionals, usually curators, exhibit developers/designers, educators, engagement, and/or collections folks, who each critique the exhibit from their own professional perspective - what works well, areas they see that didn't work as well or that confused them, innovative ideas the exhibit highlights (could be tech, content, presentation, design, programming, etc.), and questions they have for the exhibit creation team. Select members of site museum's exhibit creation team has opportunities to share their exhibit, the ideas/intentions/goals behind it, what they like best about it, what they would do differently if they could, next steps if any, and answer the reviewers questions in dialogue with them and the audience.

Audience

Audiences: Curators/Scientists/Historians

Professional Level: Emerging Professional General Audience Mid-Career Student

Scalability: Audience members should be able to apply lessons learned and shared to any size museum exhibit. The handouts on handouts outlining OHM's exhibit development process, and those handouts with information and links to current resources on exhibit design will be useful to all.

0.3 Working Together: An Inclusive Approach to Exhibit Planning and Design

ID: WMA2020.SP043

Assigned to: Cory Gooch

Track:

How can museums target, work with, and attract a more diverse audience? This session explores how the Oregon Historical Society created their core exhibit Experience Oregon using participatory models (co-creation, collaboration) for exhibit development. This session is an open forum – a back-and-forth dialog between audience and panelists. Attendees will leave with steps and strategies on how to tell a more complete story, work with multiple groups, address conflicting perspectives, navigating roadblocks, and lesson learned.

Session Information

Format: Regular session/panel (roundtable, single speaker, etc.)

Uniqueness: This session delves into the strengths and challenges of using participatory models – co-creation and collaboration – to develop an exhibit grounded in multiple perspectives.

Objectives: This session is appropriate for a general audience at all professional levels. The session is an open forum – a back-and-forth dialog between audience and panelists on the exhibit-design process. Panelists will speak briefly to introduce their role in the project before opening the floor for questions. The objectives and learning outcomes address roadblocks (including internal stakeholders), unexpected finds, and lessons learned (including negative feedback) while developing Experience Oregon. 1.) Community engagement and management of stakeholder group. The session will discuss the importance of community engagement and working with diverse stakeholders. Corraling the various groups requires tenacity, patience, strategic planning, and constant follow through. Discussions will explore what worked, and what didn't work. 2.) How to incorporate multiple perspectives and differing viewpoints. Embracing multiple perspectives in a project can, and will, lead to conflicting viewpoints on interpretation. The audience should come away with insights on how to navigate differing viewpoints while including multiple perspectives. 3.) How to respond to, or not respond to, negative feedback. Presenting a fuller, more complete narrative of history (read – the good, the bad, and the ugly) may be challenging for visitors, stakeholders, or staff. One objective of this session is to talk about negative feedback, and some strategies to manage it. This session will provide an open, safe place to discuss the challenges of a participatory exhibit design process. Our goal is to provide concrete tools to apply this model within their institutions.

Engagement: This session will be fueled by the audience's engagement in the discussions. There will be a brief presentation by the panelists before opening the floor for questions on the content development process, challenges faced, and lessons learned. Tangible takeaways include: a scalable, collaborative model for other institutions to follow, professional development, and hard earned approaches to consider prior to beginning a similar project. Resources needed: Computer for powerpoint presentation, projector, and screen

Relationship to Theme: For museums and other historic institutions to be forward-thinking and adaptable, recognizing the need to include previously unheard voices in their exhibitions is paramount. Developing Experience Oregon was a co-creative, collaborative undertaking with participants from OHS staff, Oregon Tribes; educators; content specialists; students; historians; community members; and multiple firms from across the country. The exhibition embraces diversity, equity, inclusivity and accessibility.

Additional Comments: The framework of the session sets the stage for ample discussion time between panelists and attendees. The presenters will speak briefly to describe their roles in the project before opening the floor for questions from the audience. There will be a moderator to help facilitate the discussion.

Audience

Audiences: Curators/Scientists/Historians Development and Membership Officers Events Planning Marketing & Communications (Including Social Media) Registrars, Collections Managers Technology

Professional Level: Emerging Professional General Audience Mid-Career Senior Level Student

Scalability: The process followed to develop Experience Oregon can be scaled up or down to fit any size organization. The size of the institution will determine the size of the advisory committee/stakeholder group. Having inspired, resolute staff and/or volunteers, a committed board, and dedicated consultants will be the recipe for success.
